For example, in the question of multiple choices: Do you say, Which of the following is true? or which of the following faithful? The question is: The capital of France A. London B. Ankara C. Paris In multiple choice question, for example: Do you say Which of the following is true? or Which of the following faithful? The question is: The capital of France A. London B. Ankara C. Paris I do not therefore, but many English teachers use the second. Thank you for your native response. Which one is usually accompanied by a plural noun, but the next one is never pluralized in form. The following remains the same for both single and plural values. I don't know why, but many English teachers use the second language. I assume you don't mean teachers from England. If you are referring to English teachers (English teachers may have any meaning), then they are obviously not native speakers and do not use the language properly. Of course I mean ESL teachers. The actual meaning of your example: Which of the following answers is correct? With the following adjectives. However, it is very common to leave a noun and use only an adjective as it was done here. I don't like the truth about it. I think it would be much better. You have to log in or register to respond here.
